Norwalk votes to continue Metrolink shuttle

By Alex Dominguez Staff Writer

NORWALK - The City of Norwalk voted last week to extend its pilot shuttle program through the end of June next year.

Due to expire at the end of the month, the agreement will now carry on through June 2020.

The extension costs are estimated to be at $137,390, of which funding will be supported with Prop C Local Return funds. The cost will also be fractionally offset by parking revenues from the Civic Center's 3rd floor parking structure, estimated at $8,190.

The city established the originally $266,125 agreement with MV Transportation, Inc in May of this year, providing a shuttle service between the Metrolink / Santa Fe Springs Metrolink station and the Civic Center parking structure after repeated complaints about insufficient parking availability in the Metrolink / Santa Fe lot.

There are 48 Metrolink commuters (22 residents and 26 non-residents) who have purchased monthly permits to park at the Civic Center structure and utilize the Pilot Shuttle.

Currently, the shuttle operates Monday through Friday between the hours of 4:30 a.m. and 10:30 a.m., and from 2 p.m. to 7:45 p.m. to meet arriving and departing Metrolink Commuter trains.

Council voted 4-1 in approval, with Councilman Leonard Shryock opposed.

I'm a police chief. We need to change how officers view their guns.

BY BRANDON DEL POZO

Few things are more harrowing than watching a video of a police officer confront a person in emotional crisis armed with a knife or other similar object. The officer almost always points a gun at that person and yells, "Drop it!" If staring down the barrel of a gun isn't enough to give a person pause, yelling at him or her is unlikely to make a difference.

If that person advances on the police officer, gunfire often results. Each year, American police officers shoot and kill well over 125 people armed with knives, many of them in this manner.

The public has grown impatient with seeing the same approach produce a predictably tragic result. In response, Chuck Wexler, the director of the Police Executive Research Forum, has released a guide to reducing the frequency of such incidents. At a national conference for chiefs of police in Chicago recently, he showed three videos to drive the point home: desperate people with knives met by officers who pointed guns and yelled in return.

In each case, the person grew more distressed, advanced out of a desire to be shot and was shot. Everyone suffers when this happens: the person in crisis who gets shot and may well die; the officer who will experience lifelong trauma and doubt, and his or her family and loved ones; and a community that feels it failed to help a person in need.

One of the problems is that we teach our police officers to lead with the gun. We tell officers that a knife or a shard of glass is always a lethal threat and that they should aggressively meet it with a lethal threat in return. But doing so forecloses all of the better ways to communicate with a person in crisis. There are alternatives.

Imagine being an unarmed police officer — like the ones in Iceland or Britain — in the same scenario. Barking orders as you stand there empty-handed would not only seem unnatural but also absurd. Your instincts would tell you to stay a safe distance away, try to contain the person, and calm the situation.

American police leaders can learn from their unarmed colleagues. Police academies should ingrain a wide range of skills, drills and responses in trainees before they ever handle a firearm. Training should start by sending officers into scenarios where they have to solve problems without recourse to lethal force.

Unarmed officers will cultivate an instinct to de-escalate: They will keep a safe distance, they will try to assess the true level of threat rather than see a weapon as a cue to rapidly escalate, and they will communicate in ways that reach people. There is good psychological research on what type of communication stands the best chance of calming people in distress, regardless of what is in their hands. And it is certainly not yelling at them or threatening their lives.

Only during the final phase of a police academy should trainees be presented with a firearm and taught how to use it. Officers should be taught that their weapons protect not only themselves and the public but also the life of the person who is armed and in distress, because they provide a means to stay safe if a calm and reassuring approach fails. By the end of academy, the officers will have learned that yelling at a person as you threaten to shoot is a panicked, lastditch effort, not a sign of competence.

I lead the police force in Burlington, Vt., one of the nation's most progressive cities. One of our City Council members recently suggested that we should explore ways to disarm our city's police because it would prevent them from killing people and force them to approach crises differently.

In America, this idea is a non-starter. Police officers being rendered helpless to respond to mass shootings and other gun violence puts a community in danger. But if the police profession doesn't want politicians broaching these ideas, we owe the public a commitment to doing everything we can to respect the sanctity of life. We should fundamentally change the way police officers view their guns.

America's abhorrent rate of gun violence means that the police need the equipment and training to meet even the most lethal threats. But we have the opportunity to stop this mind-set from infecting their approach other situations. Our nation's police departments should read Mr. Wexler's guide and take its recommendations seriously.

Going further by training officers to act as if their weapons are insurance policies, rather than persuasive devices, will transform the nation's police work. Every American will be made safer by police officers whose first instinct is to communicate with the people they encounter and whose success lies in getting the psychology of persuasion right.

Brandon del Pozo became the chief of police of Burlington, Vt., in 2015, after serving 19 years in the New York Police Department.

Why it is so hard to figure out what to eat

BY DAVID LUDWIG AND STEVEN B. HEYMSFIELD

Most diet trials in the best journals fail even the most basic of quality control measures. That's the finding of a study by us published today on JAMA Network Open.

Investigators receiving funding for any clinical trial from the National Institutes of Health must register in advance what they plan to test, among other design features, to ensure that the data are fairly analyzed. Comparing the original registries with the final published studies, we found that diet trials in the past decade were about four times as likely as drug trials to have a discrepancy in the main outcome or measurement — raising concern for bias.

This quality-control problem of diet trials in comparison to ones on pharmaceuticals leads to a bigger issue: underinvestment in nutrition research and in how we tackle the mysteries of a healthy diet.

Although the problems with observational studies have received much attention ("Association doesn't prove causation," as scientists say), clinical trials can suffer from equally important limitations. In a clinical trial, investigators assign volunteers to receive different treatments — such as a low-carbohydrate versus low-fat diet — ideally in random order. Beyond registry issues, trials may provide misleading results for many reasons, including small size, short duration and weak interventions (they lack power to actually make the intended change in behavior).

These failures are disturbing because epidemics of diet-related disease will shorten life expectancy and impose huge economic costs on the United States in coming years. We continue to lack effective dietary prevention, in part because clinical trials have been too poorly designed and conducted to reach definitive conclusions. We're still debating questions that have raged for decades: Should we focus on reducing carbs or fat? Is red meat harmful? Is sugar toxic? What about artificially sweetened beverages or moderate amounts of alcohol?

results to any specific dietary component.

Diet trials also require subjects to change their eating habits, a far greater challenge than taking a pill.

Consider a trial for a promising cancer treatment in which participants assigned to receive the drug didn't take it as intended. If the drug group showed no benefit over the placebo group, we wouldn't automatically assume the drug lacked promise. We would conclude that the study failed and that stronger methods (medication organizer trays and daily text message reminders, say) are needed to make sure the drug is properly used so that we can see if it works. Yet the illogical assumption that a diet didn't work is commonly made when volunteers in weak trials do not follow the assigned diets.

Short diet trials, the great majority of those done, raise special concerns. Many people can lose weight by restricting calories at first, but few can maintain substantial weight loss that way. After a few days or weeks, the body begins to resist calorie deprivation, with rising hunger and slowing metabolism. Making matters more complicated, it takes several weeks to adapt to major changes in nutrients. For these reasons, short-term trials may have little relevance to understanding how diet affects health over the long term.

It would be like studying an intensive exercise program including long runs, calisthenics and strenuous sports — among sedentary volunteers for just six days. The investigators might find that the program made the volunteers sore, tired and weak. However, a six-month trial, allowing adequate time to adapt to the new regimen, would reach the opposite conclusion, revealing the real

Advisory Committee reviews the science in preparation for new Department of Agriculture recommendations to the public in 2020. Among thousands of scientific articles initially screened, only a small proportion so far have passed strict quality criteria for inclusion in committee deliberations. And ultimately, recommendations to the public can be no stronger than the science on which they rely.

Which doesn't mean that all nutrition research is unreliable. High-quality observational studies and clinical trials provide strong evidence for the benefits of whole carbohydrates (nonstarchy vegetables, fruits, legumes, minimally processed intact grains) over highly processed, fast-digesting carbohydrates (refined grains, potato products and added sugar). We also know that nuts, olive oil and avocado protect against chronic disease, contrary to dietary recommendations during the low-fat diet era, as embodied by the 1992 Food Guide Pyramid.

We need a sort of Manhattan Project to find definitive answers to the epidemics of diet-related disease. Nutrition research to prevent disease must have the same quality and rigor as pharmaceutical research to treat disease. Building the necessary scientific infrastructure will require sustained investment by government and philanthropic organizations, but the amounts involved would total a fraction of a cent for every dollar spent treating diet-related conditions like obesity, Type 2 diabetes and cardiovascular disease.

Study authors and the media can help by avoiding the tendency to overstate the results of weak research, contributing to public confusion. And the public has a critical role to play, not only demanding government action but also volunteering for diet studies.

High-quality trials are hard to do because diets, and the behavior of humans who consume them, are so complicated. A single meal might have dozens of nutrients and hundreds of other bioactive substances that interact in unknown ways. Furthermore, if the diet being studied increases intake from one food category, people may eat less from other food categories, making it difficult to attribute benefits of physical activity.

Despite their greater difficulties, diet trials receive far less funding than drug trials, especially considering that poor diet is the leading risk factor for premature death. Few big companies stand to profit directly from dietary treatments for chronic diseases. Consequently, typical diet trials must get by on shoestring budgets, rarely exceeding a few hundred thousand dollars, compared with drug trials that may cost several hundred million dollars. Without adequate support, quality inevitably suffers. Diet trials of adequate size, duration and intervention strength rarely get done.

This problem has special relevance now, as the Dietary Guidelines

No other factor approaches the importance of diet for public health. To reduce the human toll of chronic disease, we must upgrade the quality of nutrition research. The financial investment required will yield huge returns in medical cost savings.

Do we really need billionaires?

BY NEGIN OWLIAEI

Bill Gates wants you to know he pays taxes.

"I've paid more than $10 billion in taxes. I've paid more than anyone in taxes," Gates told journalist Andrew Ross Sorkin. "But when you say I should pay $100 billion, OK, then I'm starting to do a little math about what I have left over."

Supposedly Gates was talking about a wealth tax 2020 candidates have supported. But no plan yet proposed would seize $100 billion from the philanthrocapitalist anytime soon. Even if it did, he'd still Gates isn't the only billionaire who's worried. JPMorgan Chase CEO Jamie Dimon also has concerns about the rising resentment towards his fellow elites.

"I think you should vilify Nazis," Dimon told Lesley Stahl, "but you shouldn't vilify people who worked hard to accomplish things." Billionaire investor Leon Cooperman, who's become a fixture on CNBC, recently teared up while complaining about the "vilification of billionaires."

Why do the feelings of the 600 Americans that constitute our billionaire class suck up so much media attention?

For one thing, billionaires literally own the news. Buying up media companies is a new rite of passage for the ultra wealthy, like the purchase of the Washington Post by Amazon head Jeff Bezos, or TIME by tech CEO Marc Benioff.

They'll say they're all about editorial independence, but the truth is billionaire ownership can affect news output. When billionaire Joe Ricketts found out the staff of DNAinfo, a network of city-based news sites he owned, was unionizing, he promptly shut down the entire venture out of spite.

There are more subtle ways in which the rich buy media access. The Gates Foundation, for example, has poured millions in donations into the media over the last several years to raise awareness around the foundation's philanthropic goals — including its controversial funding of charter schools.

Not all billionaire power is publicly broadcast, however.

In their book Billionaires and Stealth Politics, researchers Benjamin Page, Jason Seawright, and Matthew J. Lacombe document how economic elites have banded together to lobby for extremely conservative policies, like cutting estate taxes, opposing regulations on the environment and Wall Street, and gutting social programs.

Because these moves are highly unpopular, they've done this work in the background.

That means there's a network of billionaires aligned with the Koch brothers, who've poured hundreds of millions of dollars into anti-labor policies. And Rupert Murdoch, the media mogul who changed the media landscape with Fox News. And casino magnate Sheldon Adelson, who's spending his billions shaping U.S. foreign policy.

Jeff Bezos

Their enormous wealth offers them an outlandishly oversized role in our democracy. It's poisoning both our politics and our media.

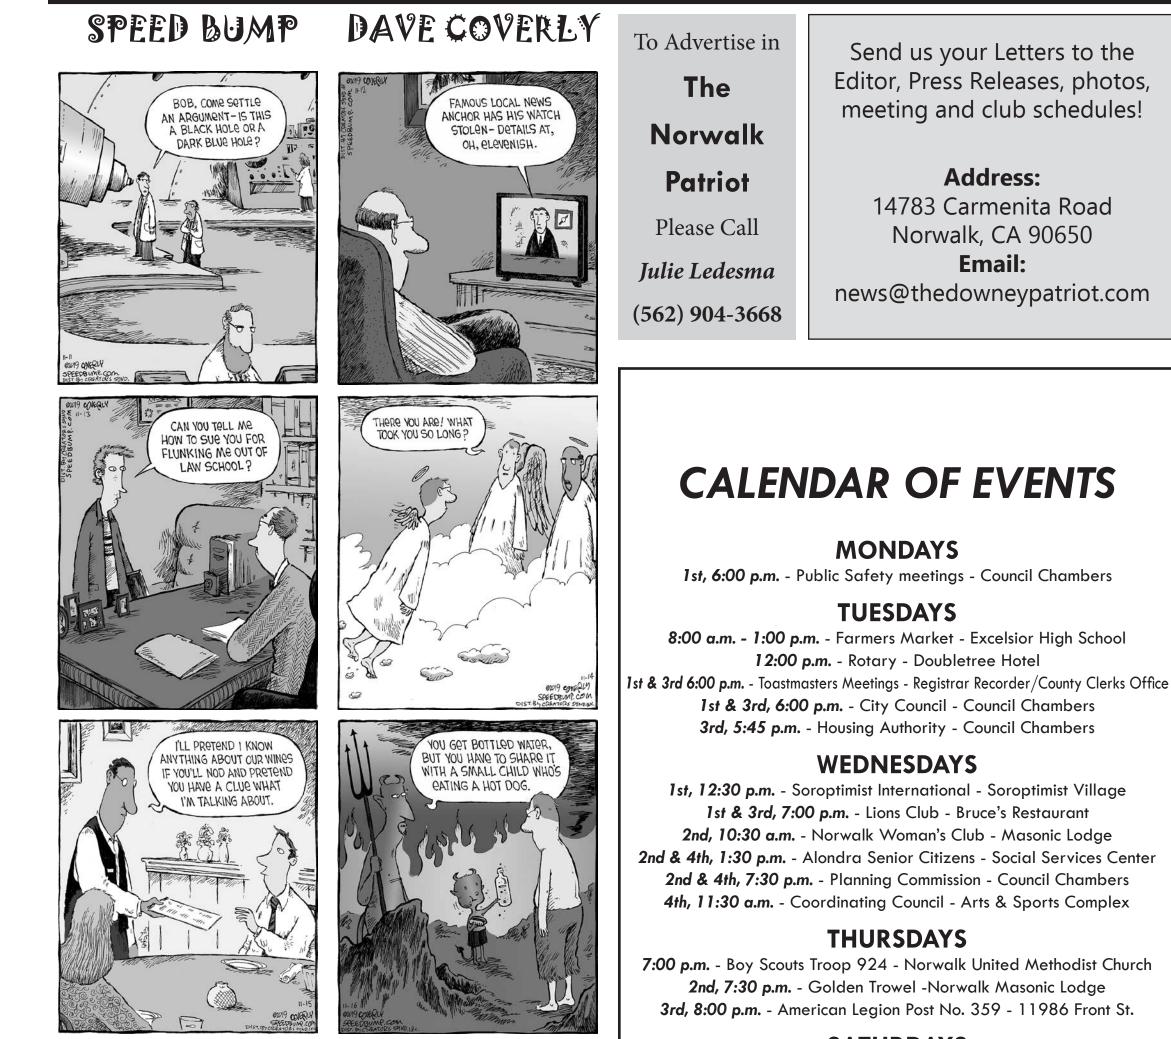

So how about a ban on billionaires? Let's tax away their wealth, but let's get them off our airwaves, too. Imagine what we'd learn if corporate media didn't devote entire news cycles to the whims of the rich.

You may not have heard, but for the last several months, the sanitation workers at Republic Services have been fighting for higher wages. "I haven't had a raise since 2004," Demetrius Tart told The Guardian. Meanwhile, the company is making a killing from the 2017 tax cuts, and returned more than $1 billion to shareholders through stock buybacks.

The company's largest shareholder? Bill Gates. Workers took their fight directly to the billionaire, protesting outside a Gates Foundation event in September with signs that read, "Bill Gates treats his workers like garbage." He ignored them.

Maybe these sanitation workers could get the airtime instead.

This is a subject that has been on the back burner of my mind for quite some time. I sure hope I'm not missing anyone, as to me, they are the most deserving of anything America has to offer in this present day.

I found this quote to be so profound: "Wars may be fought with weapons, but they are won by men." Just "ordinary guys doing extraordinary things."

Lane Spurgeon Benson Sr.

"He was one of the brave individuals that answered America's call to register for the WWl draft." He was my dad's father, I'm proud to say my grandfather. It turns out that he responded to the call but did not actually serve; he claimed exemption of the draft due to having to support a wife and five children.

Bonaparte Lowry Pate

I just came across this information and I'm just as proud to write that mom's granddad was a Civil War vet. He was born in 1834 and passed away on October 6, 1909. He is buried at Cisco, Texas. The Civil War was fought from 1861-1865.

Dick Freeland

This is mom's uncle who was a Veteran of WWl. It was known as the Great War and considered to be one of the largest wars in history. It originated in Europe and lasted from 1914-1918. I have a photo of him dressed in the uniform of that era.

George Howell Pate

Mom's brother served during WWll in the Fiji Islands. He joined the effort at age 21 in 1941, and was stationed in Arizona where he became a skilled Morse Code Operator. He returned home but the war had taken its toll and he was never quite the same. WWll spanned 1939-1945.

served in Guadalcanal where he was captured and spent time in a POW camp. He eventually suffered from a tropical disease and food shortage (a polite way of saying starvation) and insufficient clothing for the harsh winters; the results of which would cause him major physical problems later in his life. He returned home, married and had three sons before his major physical problems set in. Semper Fi, Uncle Bud.

Ray Escovedo

This is my first husband and the father of my three children. He was drafted long before we married and was stationed in Colorado Springs for his Basic Training. I recall a train ride and a visit to see him that was well remembered, accompanied by his mother and younger brother.

It was such a coincidence and brought great elation to learn that Bob Price, one of his best friends, was stationed there with him.

Levi Calvin Benson, Jr.

My brother Cal was drafted into the Army at age nineteen in 1959. His mastering of the Spanish language (fluent in speaking, reading and writing) earned him a special rank in Fort Campbell, Kentucky and Fort Sam Houston, Texas. Being in the Army afforded him the training he honed for his lifelong career as a Medical Lab Specialist. He just missed having to go to Cuba during the missile crisis and later to Viet Nam.

Robert Dennis Benson

My youngest brother, Bob, was drafted into the Army in 1965 at the age of twentyone. He was sent to Fort Polk, Louisiana for Boot Camp Training. That completed, he was sent to Fort Ord, California where he was assigned to Field Radio Communications. He then volunteered for airborne training and was sent to Fort Benning, Georgia. He was injured jumping out of a plane and reassigned as Drill Instructor to a unit specializing in night firing of a recoil weapon to be used in Viet Nam.

My daughter-in-law, married to Mark, joined the National Guard in 1989 at the tender age of seventeen. In August 1990, after graduating and turning eighteen, she started basic training at Fort Dix in New Jersey before transferring to Fort Sam Houston to Combat Medic School. Also, while in the Guard, she served as part of the medical support team during the L.A. riots. And she also went on a humanitarian mission to the country of Panama and provided medical support while the Army built an airfield.

We met many nice soldiers and sailors but not one seemed to "hit the spot" until one evening when a handsome sailor named Ralph asked me to dance. He looked like Charlton Heston.

I had already made plans the night before to meet with another sailor this evening. He was to take me home. I was in an awkward spot, as I knew I wanted the new handsome man to take me home instead of the

Downey residents push City Council for protection from landlords

Fearing evictions, renters are urging Downey council members to protect them ahead of a new housing law scheduled to take effect Jan. 1.

By Alex Dominguez Staff Writer

DOWNEY - With the fate of many of Downey's renters at stake, Downey City Council will meet next week to decide on if Downey will enact an emergency moratorium on no-fault evictions.

With Assembly Bill 1482 looming just a few weeks away, Tuesday evening was council's chance to take its first steps in choosing if they want to intervene between the city's landlords and potentially evicted tenants.

AB 1482 – which was signed into law by Gov. Gavin Newsom in October and will take effect on Jan. 1 next year - imposes statewide rent control and prohibits no-fault evictions.

However, this has caused landlords in the region and statewide to try and beat the law's implementation by evicting their tenants without cause, allowing them to preemptively raise the rent.

It was Council Member Sean Ashton who asked for the issue to be brought to the Council on Tuesday

"I wanted to have our attorney give us a briefing as to some of the information that we've been given as to regards to similar ordinances in other cities," said Ashton.

According to City Attorney Yvvette M. Abich Garcia, her office surveyed 16 cities. Garcia reported that she found a commonality between these cities, in that the application of such moratoriums protected tenants who were in possession of the premises and the notice of eviction has not expired.

"The heart and soul of these of what the landlord can do with

"When you accuse and that any moratoriums put in place before it's official roll not understanding your plight, out would "force [the DAOR] I want you to know that this to take legal action and seek an seat that I occupy right now, I injunction.'

For Downey to pass any such ordinance, it will require four out of five council members to vote for its approval. With Councilman Alex Saab absent and Rodriguez forced to abstain due to his status as a landlord in the city, council's only options were to give some direction to staff, and push any official decision to a later date.

In the meantime, Council had to face down an emotional and frustrated group of residents who have showed up en masse to the last several council meetings, many of whom hail from the Eden Roc apartment complex.

Tenants from Eden Roc have accused their landlord of trying to unscrupulously evict or price out their residents over the last few months.

As has become the regular occurrence in past weeks, many of the group made use of the non-agenda and public agenda comment periods.

Recalling a sunrise and a sunset

By Mario Amado Castaneda Contributor

If you ever have a chance to see one, do it; especially if it is with someone you love.

These two stories cover a long space in time about my biggest fan, my mother. She did the best that she knew how and I loved her for that. Her name was Virginia Castaneda but I always called her Mama. She liked to call me Amado, which in Spanish means "beloved."

Together we saw the seasons change year after year. At a very early age, I noticed she was always awake before the sunrise and by the time sunset was ending, my mother was ready for tomorrow.

I remember a vague childhood memory of seeing my first sunrise with my dear mama. We were going someplace. The only thing out that night were the stars. I was asleep but I do remember tossing and turning in the backseat of our vehicle when my mother lovingly said in Spanish, "ninos, ninos, wake up, we are here now."

I woke up and rubbed my eyes. I saw my mother and this beautiful sunrise in front of her. I wanted to get a little bit closer so I climbed up on the back of the seat and grabbed her shoulders. She picked me up and then both of us looked at the marvelous sunrise together. It was a sight to see.

It seems like yesterday even though she passed away about 15 years ago.

Years later, sitting in the patio of our cozy apartment with my lovely wife Rosa, something caught my eye and another memory of my mother came over me; and so my sunset story begins.

It was one late afternoon when my mother and I were cleaning some offices in the city of Vernon. The building had remarkable views facing downtown Los Angeles and the ocean.

My mother was rushing me to hurry up. She did not want to be late for church that day. I was working in one of the offices when suddenly I heard my mom yelling and screaming my name out loud.

"Amado, Amado, come here!"

Even though Amado means beloved, something in the sound of her voice told me something was very wrong.

I dropped what I was doing and ran very fast to the back of the building. The door was wide open when I got there.

I was expecting the worst. My mother was standing and pointing at something outside in the distance. I didn't look to see what she was pointing at because I was in a panic mode. My eyes were too busy making sure my mother was not hurt in any way.

To tell you the truth, my heart was beating very fast. I thought I was going to have a heart attack.

Throughout this whole time, my mother kept repeating, "Mijo, mira" (son, look). I turned around to see what she was pointing at. Oh, believe me, I wanted to say something to scold her for scaring me but I couldn't. The only words that came out of my mouth were, "Si, mama, it's a beautiful sunset."

She turned around and gave me the biggest and most calming smile I ever saw. At that moment, I was looking at something magical in front of me. The light from the sunset was kissing her pale white skin and seemed to be dancing in her curly brown hair. We gazed at the view for a very long time before the sunset said goodnight to the both of us.

While I may sometimes miss a sunrise and sunset, I will always remember the first one's I saw. Gracias, mama, from your loving son, Amado.

The Best Marine I Ever Met

By Gail Earl Contributor

Back in the day when patriotism was on the mind of every young man and woman in the country, all very willing to do their part and serve in the war effort, my father enlisted on 10/7/1943. I'm told that he was enthusiastic and proud to do what he could. His patriotism and honor toward the country superseded his own fear.

He was in service for almost two years when he was shipped to Iwo Jima. On Feb. 19, 1945, 30,000 troops landed on the island of Iwo Jima. The task at hand was to take this dirt and rock island and use it for a much-needed air strip for the continued attacks in an epic military campaign.

The enemy waited in their foxholes and caves until everyone was on the beach before they opened fire, causing a complete bloodbath. One hundred percent of my father's platoon was either killed or wounded. That fact astounds me.

There is no way that I can even imagine the horror of laying on the ground with thousands of wounded and dead soldiers. Dad was a mere 24 years old and was only there on the island two days when he had his knee and shoulder blown apart by mortar fragments. He was loaded onto a hospital ship and transferred to a Navy hospital in Hawaii and then to New York. He spent over a year in the hospital recovering and rehabbing.

The hideous and disturbing images that I have seen from file footage from the Battle haunt me to my core. I can't imagine someone living with those actual memories. I question how any soldier that has been in battle is able to put life back into prospective. I can't imagine how they can possibly emotionally move past the visions in their heads.

The letter that my grandmother received said the following:

3/20/1945

My dear Mrs. Steensma,

A report has just been received that your son, Private First Class Donald Steensma USMC, was wounded in action Feb.22,1945 at Iwo Jima, Volcano Islands.

Because of the great volume of communications now required for essential military operations, the report received was necessarily brief and did not disclose the extent of his injuries. It is hoped that he will communicate with you soon, informing you of his welfare.

Your anxiety is realized and you may be sure that when any new information is received it will be forwarded. Meanwhile you have been furnished all the details, and you'll help this headquarters if you will only write to notify us of any change in your address.

Sincerely Major F Belton.

How does a mother breathe after opening that letter?

The part of all of this that troubles me the most is how such an injured man, both physically and emotionally, moves forward, gets married and has four children and has an especially wonderfully admirable and happy life? Dad was the warmest, most loving tender man you could ask for.

In all of the years up until his death in 1993, he never once talked about the service. Over my entire life, not once did I see him raise his voice in anger or even have an argument.

There are so many questions that I wish I had known to ask.

I am saddened to think of the silent pain he kept in his mind for all those years. I think it was just probably too tormenting to speak of. I knew he was a proud Marine but that's all I knew. Maybe all the horror is what made his heart so tender to all that knew him after the service.

Daddy, for whatever your reason, I'm sorry that you had to keep all your pain inside. I have loved you every day of my life and I thank you for your service.
