SEAACA under fire over inaccesability

■ The SEAACA executive director heard grievances from community members expressing issues with the organization's accessibility and hours of operation.

By Vincent Medina Contributor

NORWALK - Norwalk community members explained their grievances towards the Southeast Area Animal Control Authority during the city council meeting on Tuesday.

Woodside, Denise the executive director of SEAACA, gave a presentation to the council explaining the organization's goal to provide adequate care for pets and animals. She also showed SEAACA resources on their website and said the site is "updated multiple times a day" for owners to check for their pets.

"Our animal care team is caring and feeding the animals at the care center, regardless of the time of day or whether it is a major holiday," Woodside said. "We strive to reunite pets with their families, which can happen in the field or at our animal care

However, community members spoke during public comments and expressed that SEAACA and the animal care center are inaccessible to working pet owners. Residents also made claims of miscommunication within the organization, causing the euthanization of animals.

Anett Conde volunteers to network for the animals and find their owners. She said the animal care center's hours of operation its doors. make it difficult for pet owners to reunite with their pets.

"The hours are limited, Wednesday through Saturday 1 pm to 3 pm. While most of us work during that time, and a lot of the time the owners cannot come pick up their pet," Conde said.

Carmen Verdugo shared data from the SEAACA website and LA County Animal Care and Control, showing a 72% decrease in animal intake since 2020. Data also indicates that SEAACA is open eight hours a week for animal viewing and a three-month wait list for spay and neutering.

"There is also a 30% decrease in employees since 2020," Verdugo said. "I adopted a dog February and he did not get neutered until Friday because the site is so understaffed."

executive explained the change in hours is due to the COVID-19 pandemic and said SEAACA is working on expanding services and reopening

Two decades in prison did not prepare me for the horrors of county jail

By Christopher Blackwell

Christopher Blackwell is an incarcerated writer and a co-founder of the nonprofit Look 2 Justice. He is a contributing writer at Jewish Currents and a contributing editor at The Appeal.

When I was 22 years old, I committed robbery and murder. I plead guilty and was sentenced to 45 years, of which I have so far served two decades. During that time, I've experienced the squalor and dangerous conditions of various state prisons. I've lived in a crumbling penitentiary built in the 1800s. I've been put in isolation for weeks on end because of Covid exposure and infection. Still, I was not prepared for what I found when I was transferred to a county jail for two weeks last December.

Along with people serving short sentences for relatively minor offenses, jails house people who are awaiting trial and either didn't get bail or simply couldn't pay it — people, that is, who have not been convicted of any crime.

Despite that fact, conditions in these facilities are often worse, and sometimes much worse, than those in the prisons where people who are convicted of the worst crimes are confined. Jails throw people together in overcrowded units that may be controlled by the most violent people in the room. Like prisons, jails house a disproportionate number of people experiencing addiction or chronic health conditions but jails lack the resources to treat them and adequate staffing overall. Udi Ofer, a professor at Princeton University who focuses on policing and criminal justice reform, told me that jails "regularly rely on even harsher conditions of confinement" than prisons do.

As a prison writer, journalist and criminal justice activist, I try to communicate to anyone who will listen that the vast majority of incarcerated people will eventually return to their communities. The trauma they suffer on the inside comes with them. Just as a very short time in solitary confinement can cause lasting harm, weeks or months in county jail can have a huge negative impact on people's lives, even after they are released. What happens in jails doesn't stay in jails.

Ethan Frenchman, a lawyer in Washington who advocates on behalf of people with disabilities in jails, told me that while the nation's roughly 1,500 state prisons are operated or overseen by 50 states, the 3,000 or so jails "are operated by who knows how many hundreds or thousands of different jurisdictions," making it extremely hard to get reliable information about what goes on there, or to enforce any kind of accountability.

One data point is unmistakable: suicide rates. Suicides are the leading cause of deaths in jails, where they occur at a much higher rate than in prisons. Big city jails, like the complex on Rikers Island, are infamous for violence, neglect and overcrowding, but they are not outliers. In fact, research by the U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics has found that suicide rates in the nation's smallest jails were more than six times as high as those in the largest.

During my recent trip to Pierce County Jail in Tacoma, Wash., where I was sent to await a resentencing hearing that was ultimately delayed, I shared a cell with William Starkovich, a 35-year-old who had never been incarcerated before. He is awaiting trial in Pierce County Jail after an altercation with his siblings over rent money ended in two charges of assault in the

Mr. Starkovich, who gave me permission to tell his story, has received diagnoses of ADHD, manic depressive disorder, bipolar disorder and autism spectrum disorder. Since his mental illness can affect his ability to maintain his physical hygiene, he is often a target of ridicule and aggression from other prisoners. He has been assaulted by other prisoners and guards alike. Mr. Starkovich told me that guards insisted on transferring him into an open dorm living unit where he didn't feel safe. When he would not step into the unit, a "code blue" was called, meaning that a prisoner was defying an order. He was wrestled to the ground, tased and handcuffed.

Reports from jails across the country, from Rikers in New York to Santa Clara County's Main Jail complex, in San Jose, Calif., have shown that mentally ill people are frequently mistreated. Families have filed lawsuits alleging that corrections officers have severely beaten mentally ill people, or let them starve or freeze to death. A 2014 internal investigation at Rikers found that almost 80 percent of the more than 100 prisoners who sustained serious injuries during altercations with corrections officers in an 11-month period were mentally ill.

Conditions in county jails aren't just bad for people suffering from mental illnesses. Prisoners there are often given so little food that they are hungry all the time and must buy more in the commissary. My meals in prison consist of larger portions and far more fruits and vegetables than my meals in jail. To my surprise, even found myself missing the flavors and variety of prison food. A prisoner in Maine summed up a typical meal in a county jail well when he asked a reporter to "consider eating ground-up gym mat with a little bit of seasoning." But jail commissaries are so expensive that many people who can't afford bail also can't afford anything sold in them. In jail, I saw people beat each other up over commissary food.

on Amazon and just under $8 in my Washington State prison cost $26.40 in the Pierce County Jail's commissary while I was incarcerated there. A small bag of freeze-dried coffee that costs $3.34 in state prison cost almost $13 in County.

Phone calls to our loved ones, which cost just over a dollar for 20 minutes at a Washington State prison, cost nearly $4 from the county jail. An investigation by the Prison Policy Initiative found that in 20 states, phone calls from jails were at least three times as expensive as calls from state prisons. The calls I made from both state prison and the county jail are managed by the same company, Securus Technologies, and I see no legitimate reason they should be three times as expensive from one facility

And not only the day-to-day living conditions are hard. In state and federal prisons across the country, people have access to positive programming to help them better themselves, educate themselves and take responsibility for the crimes they've committed. I've worked for years in prison to earn an associate degree from Seattle Central College, and I am five classes shy of a bachelor's degree in English and sociology. I have also cofounded a nonprofit, received training in restorative justice practices and worked as a restorative justice facilitator.

None of that changes the fact that I took another person's life. I will live with profound regret about that for the rest of mine. However, one day I will return home. Thanks to the positive programs I have been able to participate in, the person who walks out of the prison gates will bear little resemblance to the person who entered them. Many people in prisons are trying to better themselves. For the most part, people in jail are just trying to

We have to care about what's happening in county jails if we are to make our communities safer. Eliminating cash bail, which puts people behind bars simply because they don't have enough cash on hand, would drastically reduce the number of people in county jails. It would also make jails more humane environments for those who need to be detained for legitimate public safety concerns while they work their way through the court system. And research in states and cities across the country has found that eliminating or curtailing the use of cash bail does not have a negative effect on public safety.

Price restrictions that keep private companies from gouging prisoners and their loved ones could help those incarcerated in county jails get the food they need without resorting to violence. With positive changes, people confined in county jail could come out of their stays better equipped to thrive in their communities.

I may be in prison for decades to come, but Mr. Starkovich, Twenty-four packets of Top Ramen noodles that costs $6 like many men I met in county jail, could be released in the coming weeks. He will carry the memory of hunger, violence and fear with him.

My company introduced a four-day workweek. Guess what happened?

By Mark Mullen

Mark Mullen is the chief executive of Atom, a U.K.-based bank.

Coming out of covid, the digital start-up bank where I'm chief executive needed re-energizing. Lockdowns had been hard for everyone. Strong demand for technology workers as the economy bounced back also threatened to deprive us of some of our best

So we switched to a four-day week.

Atom bank is a nine-year-old digital retail bank based in the north of England. We have about 470 employees, and we're proud of our culture. But this move to such a liberal employment regime wasn't a manifestation of "wokeism" gone mad. Far from it. This was a pragmatic response to the employment market and the development of our company. We wanted to increase productivity, not reduce it.

The idea of a four-day week has gathered momentum since the pandemic, in part as a possible way to counter the "Great Resignation." In the United Kingdom last year, a trial of the four-day week involving about 3,000 employees at 61 companies was largely successful. The trial, which was conducted partly by researchers at Boston College, found that employee well-being went up while company revenue was not significantly affected. Other similar pilot programs have found a four-day week can reduce absenteeism and staff turnover.

Before making the decision, we planned it out in great detail to remove the risk of the policy backfiring. We designed new shift patterns and established some core hours that had to be worked. We looked at studies in Nordic countries that showed it could be done and suggested best practices.

And in November 2021, we introduced the four-day workweek to our staff, cutting 3.5 hours off each employee's workweek while leaving their pay unchanged. We figured this investment worked out at about 9 percent of the cost of each staff member.

And guess what happened? Employees were very receptive, of course. And at first, there was no measurable deterioration in productivity, either. So what does that tell us? I believe there's some buffer in just about every company. I don't believe staff members are lazy. But perhaps having fewer hours in the workweek encourages everyone to be more efficient, streamlining cumbersome processes. This is probably even truer in bigger companies than in start-ups such as ours, where keeping an eye on costs is more critical.

As time went by, we continued measuring the effect of this new work policy. Since we made the change, we have seen a reduction in recruitment costs, a fall in unwanted staff attrition, lower absences because of sickness and higher employee engagement with our brand. We've also seen higher employee productivity, not handpicked, rose-tinted performance measures — they are the fundamentals of building and running a business.

And though we can't be sure of cause and effect — some of the because our company is getting older and wiser — it's hard not to believe our approach to the workweek is contributing in some from home might seem positively outdated.

None of this is easy for executives at older companies to hear, and I have some sympathy with their position. We have also embraced working from home, which suits our digital business. But that is perhaps easier for a company such as ours than it is for legacy businesses. Senior executives who are not accustomed to working alone, or from home, are understandably unnerved by rows of expensive empty desks in even more expensive and cavernous office buildings.

Certainly, I have felt from time to time a feeling of isolation and a sense of unease at working from home. But I'm convinced that it's only because I didn't design Atom bank to be as remote and self-service-style for employees as it has become. The transition to an entirely new way of working is bound to be uncomfortable, but it doesn't make it wrong.

I've spent the greater part of my 33-year career commuting to and from offices and working five days a week, at least. In common with millions of workers around the world, it wasn't until February 2020 and the outbreak of the global pandemic that of necessity — my behavior changed.

In the years since, though, I haven't just changed my higher profitability and higher customer satisfaction. These are behavior. I've changed my attitudes and beliefs. It's as though the pandemic broke a spell that had kept us all enthralled to a working paradigm that turned out to be well past its sell-by date.

With the acceleration of artificial intelligence and other positive trends could be because pressures on staffing eased, or technologies, I believe we should all start to prepare for a radically new world of work. In this context, even a four-day week working

Former La Mirada Softball trio finds a home at Mt. SAC

■ Archuleta, Espinoza and Urbina part of the team in 3C2A State Championships; Mounties aiming for 7th state

By John M. Sherrard Contributor

WALNUT – The odds of three high school senior softball players ending up at the same college and making an immediate impact in their freshmen year is a unique situation.

These three La Mirada grads have fit in nicely with the Mt. San Antonio College Softball program.

It just so happens that beginning Thursday (May 18) and continuing through Sunday (May 21), Mt. SAC will be playing in the California Community College Athletic Association (3C2A) State Championships.

The Mounties, a high-end softball program, will be aiming for their seventh state title since 2003.

three La Mirada The standouts are Grace Archuleta, Janis Espinoza and Aleyna Urbina.

"We've never recruited three players from one high school," said Mt. SAC assistant coach Jim Bollier, who has been with the program as a coach since 2009. "These are two strong defensive and offensive players and the other (Urbina) is strong in the circle.

"They've played together at La Mirada and have brought that special bond to Mt. SAC."

Bollier, who is heavily involved in the recruiting process for the Mounties softball program, said of the three players – "Grace (Archuleta) is a valuable part of the outfield and in certain situations when in the lineup, she has a sneaky bunt and also no fielding errors. Her strongest point is defense."

Archuleta is batting .444 (8 for 18) and has a .500 slugging percentage.

"It's very different here at Mt. SAC than in high school. Coach (Brent) Tuttle (La Mirada Softball coach) would be very excited for us, and he still posts about us on social media and he's still watching all of us. He'd be very excited for us."

Espinoza, who was a big part of Mt. SAC this year and also for La Mirada, said of the three of them – "Honestly, it's very exciting and we all have different roles on the team. (Mt. SAC Coach Ruby) Rojas has said to have each other's backs and Grace (Archuleta) has so much passion out there when she gets to go out there. She has a fire in her. I just love watching her.
