Warehouse workers could get relief from heat

■ California is considering legislation to protect indoor workers from excessive heat.

By Samantha Young KFF Health News

The stifling heat inside some warehouses where workers might spend 10hour days isn't just a summer problem. In Southern California, it can feel like summer all year.

It's easy to break into a sweat and grow tired, workers say. The ventilation feels inconsistent, they say, and workers have testified in a public hearing about nosebleeds, nausea, and dizziness. In some warehouses, the walk to find a place to cool down is at least half a mile.

"We are in constant motion. Throughout the day, my shirt is soaked in sweat three to four times," said Sara Fee, a former worker at an Amazon warehouse in San Bernardino who testified before a state workplace safety board in May. "I have been nauseous, dizzy."

As the climate warms and the threat of extreme heat spreads, California is poised to protect people who work in poorly ventilated warehouses, steamy restaurant kitchens, and other indoor job sites where temperatures can soar to potentially dangerous levels. The state has had heat standards on the books for outdoor workers since 2005, and indoor workplaces are next.

Only two other states,
Minnesota and Oregon, have adopted heat rules for indoor workers, according to the U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration.
Nationally, legislation has stalled in Congress, and even though the Biden administration has initiated the long process of establishing national heat standards for outdoor and indoor work, the rules are likely to take years to finalize.

If California adopts its proposal in the spring, businesses would be required to cool worksites below 87 degrees Fahrenheit when employees are present and below 82 degrees in places where workers wear protective clothing or are exposed to radiant heat, such as furnaces. If businesses are unable to lower the temperatures, they must provide workers with water, breaks, areas where they can cool down, cooling vests, or other means to keep employees from overheating.

"It is only getting hotter every year," said Alice Berliner, director of the Worker Health & Safety Program at the University of California-Merced.

"Having protections for both indoor and outdoor workers, it empowers someone to feel like they can ask for access to drinking water, and access to a break when they feel like they're bot"

Neither workers nor businesses are satisfied with the plan. Some businesses fear they won't be able to meet the requirements, even with the flexibility the regulation offers. Workers argue buildings should be kept even cooler.

Heat stress can lead to heat exhaustion, heatstroke, cardiac arrest, and kidney failure. In 2021, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported 1,600 heat-related deaths, which is likely an undercount because health care providers are not required to report them. It's not clear how many of these deaths are related to work, either indoors or outdoors.

In California, 20 workers died from heat between 2010 and 2017, seven of them because of indoor heat, according to the Rand Corp., which analyzed the state's proposed indoor heat rules.

After a record-breaking heat wave in the Pacific Northwest in 2021, Oregon in 2022 adopted protections for indoor workers that trigger when temperatures hit 80 degrees. Minnesota's threshold temperatures range from 77 degrees to 86 degrees, depending on the type of work. The sheer size of California's workforce, estimated at about 18 million, could usher in changes for the rest of country, said Juanita Constible, senior climate and health advocate at the Natural Resources Defense Council.

"As California goes, so goes the nation on so many things," she said.

California regulators have crafted the indoor rules to complement the state's protections for outdoor workers. Those say that when temperatures exceed 80 degrees, employers must provide shade and observe workers for signs of heat illness. At or above 95 degrees, they must come up with ways to prevent heat illness, such as reducing work hours or providing additional breaks. Colorado, Oregon, and Washington also have rules for outdoor workers.

The California Occupational Safety and Standards Board, which is charged with setting worker protections, is weighing the regulation that would require employers to cool their buildings with air conditioning, fans, misters, and other methods when the temperature or the heat index hits 82 or 87. Some employees would be exempt from the rule, including employees who work remotely and those involved in emergency operations.

The board is expected to vote on the rules in March, and they would take effect by this summer, board Chief Counsel Autumn Gonzalez said

Workers say buildings should be cooler than the proposed temperatures, especially in warehouses, food-processing plants, and other places where employees routinely move and lift.

These temperature

thresholds "are too high," said Robert Moreno, a UPS driver in San Diego who told the board in May that he has spent most of his life working in warehouses. At the proposed temperatures, it's too hot to sit outside and eat lunch, let alone work inside a building that's been baking in the sun all day, he said.

"Most of these warehouses are sheet metal, zero to no airflow."

At the Amazon facility in San Bernardino where Fee worked, company spokesperson Steve Kelly said the building is airconditioned and outfitted with ceiling fans, and workers are encouraged to take cooldown breaks anytime they need to.

"We've seen the positive impacts of an effective heat-mitigation program and believe all employers should be held to the same standard," said Kelly, who declined to say whether the company supports the California proposal.

The temperature inside the 658,000-square-foot building hasn't risen above 78 degrees, Kelly said.

Regulators have acknowledged that some businesses won't be able to cool their workplaces, such as laundries or restaurant kitchens, where commercial boilers, ovens, and fryers operate, and have offered them the option of giving workers cooldown areas and other relief.

But those solutions aren't always feasible, Katie Davey, former legislative director of the California Restaurant Association, told the board in May. For instance, there isn't room for a cooldown area in many small restaurants, she said. And lowering temperatures in a kitchen could put restaurants in violation of food safety laws that require food to be heated to specific temperatures, she added.

"We are concerned that the proposed indoor-heat illness regulations may conflict with regulations which affect our ability to heat and hold food to the necessary temperatures to protect the public health from foodborne illness," Davey said.

California regulators have spent years drafting their proposal, and it appears unlikely they will lower the threshold temperatures of 82 degrees and 87 degrees. Doing so would increase the number of businesses that have to comply and the cost, triggering a new review that would delay the regulation's release, said Eric Berg, deputy chief of health and research and standards at California's Division of Occupational Safety and Health, which would enforce the regulation.

"I think that the threshold should be lowered, in general," said board member Laura Stock, at the May meeting. "But equally, if not, more importantly, is that we don't hold the process up so that we can get a standard in place as quickly as possible."

The urgency comes, in part, because of federal inaction. Legislation has stalled in Congress to require OSHA to publish an emergency rule to enact temporary standards for all workers while the agency pursues a permanent standard. The bill is unlikely to pass the Republicancontrolled House, which hasn't favored regulations on business.

Rep. Greg Casar (D-Texas), a co-sponsor of that bill, said the situation has become dire in his state. In June, Texas Republican Gov. Greg Abbott signed a law eliminating existing local ordinances in Austin, Dallas, and other cities that required employers to give outdoor construction workers water breaks.

"As the climate worsens, and as summers get hotter, we should be doing more to protect workers, rather than taking their rights away," Casar told KFF Health News. "Too often, worker protection rules have been allowed to die a slow death in a prolonged rulemaking process, and we can't let that happen here."

The Vatican's sleight-of-hand on blessings for same-sex couples

Pop Francis isn't as progressive as some make him out to be.

By Celia Wexler

Celia Wexler is a journalist and the author of "Catholic Women Confront Their Church: Stories of Hurt and Hope." She writes frequently on Catholicism, feminism and politics.

When the Vatican officially announced its approval of the blessing of same-sex couples this week, the media went into overdrive. The news was termed a "shocking reversal on same-sex relationships," a "landmark ruling," and a "radical shift in church policy."

You'd think the hyperventilating reaction signaled a major reform. Instead, all the attention concerned a change that was much more modest and not even new.

Back in October, Pope Francis, responding to questions from ultra-conservative cardinals, wrote that he was open to permitting the blessing of same-sex couples, provided they were done by priests on a case-by-case basis, and were not confused with Catholic marriage, which is defined by the church as a union between a man and woman open to procreation.

A declaration released Monday, approved by Francis and issued by his newly appointed doctrinal czar, Cardinal Víctor Manuel Fernández, said much the same thing. It does not do anything dramatic, like convening a group of moral theologians to consider revising the church's teaching on sexual ethics.

Instead, the formal policy makes clear that the Vatican is not approving the blessing of a same-sex union, which remains sinful in the church's eyes, but blessing the couples in those unions.

And while it reflects a definite change in the church's approach to LGBTQ Catholics, and will bring hope to those who still search for some acceptance in the church, it does nothing to revise Catholic doctrine.

Indeed, the Vatican's extensive policy is also clamping down on what some reform-minded bishops in Europe had already begun to do – creating rituals and prayers to bless same-sex unions.

This narrowly tailored Vatican ruling won't prevent one gay Catholic teacher from getting fired from a parochial school, open any church for gay Catholics to meet, require Catholic social service agencies to permit gay couples to adopt, or persuade many conservative Catholics across the globe that LGBTQ people should not face discrimination.

It's another example of the Pope getting a lot of headlines for making cautious incremental change at the margins.

Maybe the pope thinks that this is getting the camel's nose into the tent. But if I were in a same-sex union, I wouldn't be all that pleased by this grudging concession.

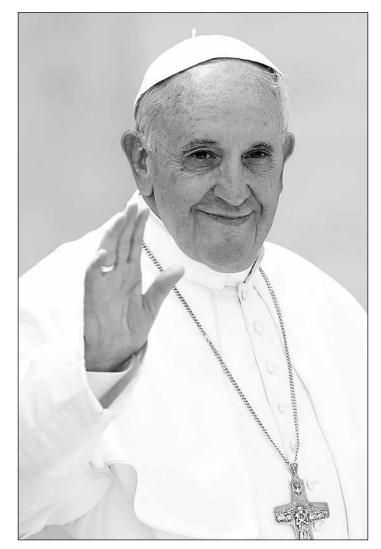

When I asked feminist theologian Mary Hunt what she thought of the Vatican's new blessing policy, she replied that it "does nothing to change the fundamental rejection of same-sex love as healthy, good, natural, and holy." She termed it "ecclesiastical sleight of hand."

Even those LGBTQ activists who are encouraged, are aware of its limitations. As Marianne Duddy-Burke, the head of DignityUSA, told The New York Times, "It feels like another window in the church has been opened, while we're still waiting for the doors to be thrown wide."

Indeed, the declaration is actually more prescriptive in its conditions than Francis was last fall. A blessing can't be held "in concurrence with the ceremonies of a civil union, and not even in connection with them." It can't look like a wedding. No tuxes or flowers or anything fancy. Bishops must not create any special rituals or prayers for it. Instead, these should happen spontaneously, during a meeting with a priest, or in the context of some group encounter, like a pilgrimage or visit to a shrine.

In short, if a blessing can be casual, the ones that same-sex partners may receive will be that. Maybe something short and sweet in the rectory? It's not clear whether the Vatican anticipates any blessings actually occurring in a church.

The document states that the church still holds that "only those sexual relations that are lived out within marriage to be morally licit," and defines marriage as an "exclusive, stable, and indissoluble union between a man and a woman, naturally open to the generation of children." So when a priest blesses a same-sex couple, what does the church intend for the blessing to do? Break them up so they find heterosexual partners? Hope they all turn celibate?

That's the problem with not being willing to confront a controversial issue in Catholicism head-on. The Pope has had more than a decade to bring the church into the 21st century. He's hinted and waffled and played with words. He's made the church more welcoming, and the papacy more popular. But many of those changes could evaporate on his death, leaving behind some confusion, a lot of disappointment, and very few substantive reforms.

Men should be screened for postpartum depression, too

Men are suffering but they are rarely diagnosed.

By Elena Sheppard

Elena Sheppard is a culture writer who focuses on books, fashion, theater and history. Her first book, "The Eternal Forest: A Memoir of the Cuban Diaspora," is forthcoming from St. Martin's Press.

After giving birth to my twins, while still recovering in the hospital, I was given a survey. Mixed among the paperwork to fill out about my boys was a sheet to fill out about me: the Edinburgh Postnatal Depression Scale, a commonly used tool to screen for perinatal depression.

I filled out the form — responding to prompts such as, "I have been so unhappy that I have had difficulty sleeping" and was relieved when I could tick the box for "No, not at all" instead of "Yes, most of the time." For the next six months, at every pediatrician appointment for my sons and postpartum appointment for me, I was given the same survey to complete — postpartum depression is possible up until a year after giving birth.

My husband who, yes, was never pregnant but did also have a wallop of new and existential responsibility heaped into his life with the arrival of our sons, was never asked at any of our appointments about his mental state — and he absolutely should have been. Many doctors already understand that the mental health of the parents is an important factor in the health of the baby — hence why I was screened by our sons' pediatrician as well as by my own physician.

All new parents should be screened for depression because the health of the entire family depends upon it.

Postpartum depression affects 1 in 7 postpartum women. It can be severe and debilitating, limiting a woman's ability to care for her child and for herself. It is encouraged, but not mandatory, for doctors to screen postpartum women for depression — less than 50% of new mothers in the United States routinely are. If women are suffering from postpartum depression, there is highly effective treatment available, but before treatment is possible it's essential for a diagnosis to be made.

It's estimated that half the postpartum women suffering with their mental health don't get treatment, and mental health conditions are a leading cause of maternal mortality in the US. Screening for postpartum depression is one small thing we can do to help new moms.

When it comes to dads, postpartum depression in men is far less discussed — and that urgently needs to change. Research indicates that paternal postpartum depression affects as many as 8% to 10% of new fathers.

Risk factors can include disrupted sleep schedules, the hormone changes that men undergo after welcoming a new child, not to mention the life changes and financial, emotional and social stresses a new baby brings. Of course, there are biological considerations as well, and men are more vulnerable if they have a history of depression (the same is true of women). The truth is that paternal postpartum depression is common — but I had never heard of it until my husband was affected.

For the first few weeks of our twins' lives, my husband was exactly the parent I knew he would be: loving, gentle, kind. And then suddenly he was not. He was distracted, forgetful, distant, quick to anger. I chalked it up to exhaustion until I just couldn't anymore.

He began to have fears and thoughts that made no sense: The babies were conspiring against him; he confessed he would look at them and feel nothing. He lost all reason when they cried and would shut down, unable to help. With two newborns, I did not have the bandwidth to help him myself, and instead I took on his share of the childcare load. It was stressful and painful for both of us, and I'm sure our children felt it, too.

"For a long time, we believed postpartum depression was hormonally related only. Now we know that hormones are a part of it, but there are a host of other variables that contribute to it," Karen Kleiman, founder and executive director of the Postpartum Stress Center, told me. The center has been working with perinatal patients since 1988. Added Kleiman: "We know that adoptive mothers get postpartum depression, and now we know that men who do not give birth can also experience full-blown clinical depression."

I still feel lucky that my husband was in therapy already at the time that he became a dad, and that his therapist quickly diagnosed what was wrong and was able to provide the medical help he needed. I don't know what would have happened had he not already been in treatment, or how long he would have suffered and therefore we as a family would have suffered. Within weeks of starting medication and continuing with therapy, he was himself again. The problem had been clinical and treatable, but diagnosis was essential.

A recent study among a small sample of new fathers concluded that screening men for postpartum depression would have significant benefits for both men and their families. The study also found that men may be more resistant to mental health services, but that receiving them if needed can make the entire family far happier and healthier.

Sixteen studies between 2002 and 2021 highlighted the importance of treating paternal depression, indicating that a family-focused approach to treatment is critical.

Historically, maternal depression was considered primary for child outcomes, but these studies show the impact of a father's mental health on the child, too. A father's untreated depression can put a child's mental health at risk.

After my husband was diagnosed, we tried to be open about our experience, but many people I told rolled their eyes or laughed. I was asked more than once if he was just trying to shirk his parenthood responsibilities or if he even "had the right" to be suffering from postpartum depression — as if he had been given a choice.

Those reactions were upsetting and show just how much needs to be done to destigmatize this issue and help the many people suffering from it. "They're being ignored by the medical community," Kleiman said of new dads who experience mental health struggles, particularly noting the many who enter parenthood already with untreated depression. "Both parents should be screened after the birth of the baby," she insisted.

In 2022, the year my sons were born, the US Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recorded 3,661,220 were born in the United States. To do some crude math, if 10% of new fathers experience postpartum depression that would amount to 366,122 men. That is a shocking number of people to be potentially affected by something that is not being screened for or that, worse, is far too often considered to be an excuse, a cop-out or even a joke.

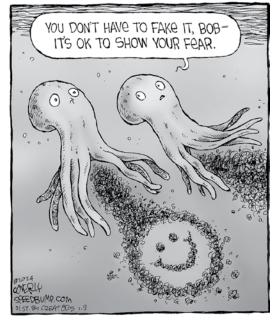

We do so little for new parents in this country:
Screening every new parent for postpartum depression
— regardless of who gave birth — is one small step we can take to help families to be the healthiest versions of themselves.
