Bill would stiffen theft penalties

■ A third shoplifting penalty would be a felony under a proposed law.

By Vincent Medina Contributor

NORWALK - State Senator Bob Archuleta, D - 30th Senate District, and Orange County District Attorney Todd Spitzer introduced California Senate Bill 923 to tackle the rising retail theft in the state at a press conference in Norwalk on Friday.

The bill aims to reimpose provisions of Penal Code 666.1, relating to serial theft, where a person convicted of petty theft or shoplifting after a third county jail for one to three years, depending on the severity of the crime.

Under the bill, a first and second offense are misdemeanors and a third offense would be charged as a felony, Archuleta explained.

"SB 923 will improve California's ability to stop organized and professional groups of thieves that target California's neighborhoods," Archuleta said. "This bill will help end the current practice of repeat offenders being released without jail time."

The state experienced a 5.9% increase in property crime in 2022 compared to 2021, with an 8.7% rise since 2020, according to statistics reported by the Public Policy Institute Angeles of California. Of reported of 2022, 64% were larceny thefts.

including Supporters, Spitzer, argue the current law is ineffective in addressing theftrelated crimes. Spitzer also addressed concerns that longer prison time would overcrowd prisons in the state.

"Repeat offenders are not accidental criminals. They know they are breaking the law by stealing, and they do it anyway because current law makes the risk far less than the reward," Spitzer said. "If this bill becomes law, it will be one year in county jail for a misdemeanor. If it's charged as a felony and there's a conviction and sentencing it will be up to three years in county jail."

Caren Spilsbury, Executive Director of the Norwalk Commerce, Chamber of the bill and emphasized the challenges small businesses face due to frequent thefts.

"The other night, I saw a Bellflower business which has been broken into four times and he's only been open for business for three months," Spilsbury said. "When we got the word that this bill was going forward and Senator Archuleta was introducing it, our Gateway Chambers Alliance immediately took action and voted to support this bill."

Newsroom layoffs are dangerous

Traditional media's struggles to raise revenue comes at the worst possible time.

By David Zurawik

David Zurawik is a professor of practice in media studies at Goucher College.

The drumbeat of layoffs, buyouts and downsizing in newsrooms has been all too steady and strong for the last two decades. But it seems to have grown louder and faster in recent days with news of layoffs at Business Insider, the Los Angeles Times, TIME Magazine and elsewhere.

Having lived through too many layoffs at the beleaguered Baltimore Sun during my 32 years there, I know about the personal cost to good journalists of the bloody process some HR professionals euphemistically call "right sizing."

But there's also a larger societal cost that comes with shrinking newsrooms at this moment in an election year when political disinformation is clearly on the rise. A democracy cannot function without accurate, vetted, factual information that citizens can trust in making decisions like who to vote for, one of the most important civic decisions in a democracy. But we are drowning in a sea of disinformation, and there are fewer and fewer lifeguards to rescue us.

The relationship came into sharp focus for me earlier this week with the news that New Hampshire residents received a robocall using what sounded like President Joe Biden's voice, urging them not to vote in the primary.

Major news organizations like CNN reported that artificial intelligence (AI) likely generated the fake voice, and almost everyone in mainstream media saw it as only the tip of the iceberg with amped-up disinformation headed our way as the battle for the White House becomes fully engaged.

Tim Franklin, senior associate dean and director of the Local News Initiative at Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism, said in an email to me that this rising tide of technology-generated disinformation in society and declining number of journalists in newsrooms is a "perfect storm"

"Last year was a brutal year for job losses in the news industry, totaling about 2,700. That was the highest level since the first year of the pandemic. The job cuts at the L.A. Times and elsewhere in recent weeks are an ominous sign that trend is continuing, if not accelerating," he told me in an email exchange. "And this is happening in an election year when people need more reliable news and information to make informed decisions. That means the economic travails of local news are colliding with the societal need for accurate and trusted news and information in an election year. It's a perfect storm."

Politicians have also noted the danger of the new tech-driven disinformation in this election year. Several senators recently introduced a bipartisan bill aimed at prohibiting deceptive AI-generated audio, images or video in political ads. But good luck getting Congress to pass anything these days.

Congress itself is, of course, a crucial environment where we need more journalists, not fewer, attuned to these issues — especially when you consider that some conservative members, notably Rep. Jim Jordan (R-Ohio), are targeting academic researchers who try to chart the ways in which disinformation is created and disseminated. The lawmakers allege anti-conservative bias and label their efforts as censorship.

On Monday, 10 members of the California congressional delegation wrote to Dr. Patrick Soon-Shiong, the billionaire owner of the Los Angeles Times, expressing their concerns about the effects layoffs would have on "on all Angelenos," the availability of essential news and the strength of our democracy at large."

According to a Los Angeles Times report, Soon-Shiong responded in part to the lawmakers by pointing to legislation in Australia and Canada that forces tech giants like Google and Facebook to pay newspapers when they use their content. He questioned the politicians on their willingness to do that here.

The deleterious effects of layoffs like the one at the Times go beyond the sheer reduction of numbers, as stark as those figures are. Several members of senior management are now gone, and with them the months of planning that go into covering an election like the one we are now in. And that's just the leadership part of it. There's also the reduced number of reporters and editors still employed in covering the election, and the morale issues they face in the wake of what took place to many of their colleagues. Soon–Shiong said the cuts were painful but necessary, as the paper loses tens of millions of dollars each year.

Shrinking newsrooms are part of a larger abrogation by media owners of the civic responsibility that was once a given in owning a journalistic platform. It goes hand in hand with companies such as Alden Global Capital ending the tradition of newspaper editorial pages endorsing candidates, while Gannett has urged its editors to cut back on editorials.

Tech billionaires now control much of our media, and many of them are geared toward profit, not public service. Serving democracy does not seem to be a top priority — no matter how threatened democracy might be.

The moment we are in is a perfect storm, all right. And it's headed for an already battered democracy that is facing challenges on multiple fronts, ranging from a candidate who continues to sow distrust in the democratic process itself by calling the 2020 election a fraud, to an electorate as polarized and angry as any since the Civil War.

Want safer streets? Paint them.

New federal guidelines make it easier for cities to paint roads and intersections.

By Janette Sadik-Khan and Kate D. Levin

Janette Sadik-Khan, former commissioner of the New York City Department of Transportation, and Kate D. Levin, former commissioner of the New York City Department of Cultural Affairs, are advisers at Bloomberg Associates.

Just as pedestrian fatalities in the United States have surged to 40-year highs, the Transportation Department delivered a December holiday gift: For the first time, federal guidelines explicitly include asphalt art projects as part of the roadway design tool kit that can be used on city streets. At last, cities have been given permission from the federal government to unlock their creative potential and roll out streets that engage the eye — and work better.

Asphalt art projects — collaborations between cities, community groups and artists — have taken off in the past decade, thanks to early-adopting cities such as New York, Seattle and Portland, Ore., with help from the National Association of City Transportation Officials and "tactical urbanism" firms such as Street Plans. They provide street designs that cue drivers to slow down, provide people on foot more interesting places to walk and create new local landmarks. They can even be used to widen sidewalks without digging up streets, giving space back to the public and making the whole street safer. To provide a road map for the increasing municipal interest, in 2019 Bloomberg Philanthropies produced the Asphalt Art Guide and launched the Asphalt Art Initiative (AAI), distributing grants to 90 projects in cities across the United States and around the world to produce and assess their own eye-catching street design projects.

Despite the overwhelming demand for projects such as these, until now they have colored just outside the lines of official street design guidance in this country. Previous versions of the DOT's Manual on Uniform Traffic Control Devices (with the ungainly acronym MUTCD) said next to nothing on the subject. The first attempt to fill the void was an infamously confusing 2013 interpretation memo on "Application of Colored Pavement" that became a roadway Rorschach test — both proponents and opponents of such projects found clauses that supported their points of view. Even worse, a now-removed part of the FAQ section explicitly prohibited such projects, asserting they had the "potential to compromise motorist safety by interfering with, detracting from, or obscuring official traffic control devices."

Meanwhile, the growing number of local engineering officials who saw benefits in this kind of street art continued to look beyond the letter of the MUTCD and approve asphalt art projects, especially when they included long-proven traffic safety elements such as painted curb extensions and lane narrowings. Building on that, Bloomberg Philanthropies partnered with Sam Schwartz Consulting and Street Plans to produce a study of 17 past arts-driven projects as well as five AAI grantee projects. That found a 50 percent reduction in crashes involving pedestrians and cyclists and a 27 percent increase in drivers yielding to pedestrians with the right of way.

And that brings us to the latest MUTCD. The manual breaks some important new ground: It finally acknowledges that many such projects exist — a milestone in itself — and, far from prohibiting or discouraging them, it provides guidance on how and where to apply them.

Of course, the new guidelines aren't perfect: They could have gone further on designing streets to reduce speeding or encouraging bike and pedestrian infrastructure. But when it comes to creative projects such as asphalt art, regulators have filled in the once-blank canvas and the naysaying opposition can finally be brushed aside. We now look forward to seeing a growing number of asphalt artists paint the town in cities coast-to-coast as we work together to tackle the country's traffic crash crisis.

The gig economy is exploiting more workers

By Terri Gerstein

Terri Gerstein is the director of the N.Y.U. Wagner Labor Initiative at the Robert F. Wagner Graduate School of Public Service at New York University.

What comes to mind when you think of a mom-and-pop small business: A hardware store? A diner? A family-run clothing store or small-scale supermarket?

Here's one that's probably never crossed your mind: a dishwashing business. By that, I mean a business of a single person — unincorporated, no business address or capital behind him, just one guy — working as a dishwasher for a restaurant, using the restaurant's machinery to wash the restaurant's dishes on the restaurant's premises.

Two explosive enforcement actions disclosed by the City and County of Denver this month expose the lengths to which some corporations will go in trying to exploit the "gig" business model. At issue is whether dishwashers and others like them, placed in their jobs by online temporary staffing agencies, are employees of the agencies or independent contractors running their own businesses.

To Denver Labor, the city's labor enforcement office, they are employees under law. The office recently issued citations to two businesses, Instawork and Gigpro, seeking over $1 million in restitution and fines.

These two staffing companies place workers in a range of hospitality positions, including as servers, bartenders, line and prep cooks and, yes, dishwashers. The citations assert that the companies misclassified the workers as independent contractors and in doing so, violated the city's minimum wage ordinance and state law on paid sick leave.

Colorado's labor law defines an employee as any person who performs labor or services for the benefit of an employer. Factors that go into making that determination include the degree of control an employer exercises over the person and the degree to which the person's work is the primary work of the employer. By contrast, an independent contractor is considered someone who works primarily free of control and direction and is "customarily engaged" in an independent trade or business related to the service performed.

The Denver cases may at first glance seem like small potatoes. But they are actually a very big deal. The cases demonstrate the spread of the exploitative gig business model far beyond Uber drivers and DoorDash food deliverers, to encompass a growing number of jobs that have long been performed by employees with legal protections. And the cases illustrate the urgent need for government intervention to safeguard core workplace rights.

Because workplace laws protect employees and not independent contractors, gig companies like Uber and Lyft save a bucket of money on both wages and taxes by avoiding the obligations that every other employer must follow: wage-related laws as well as unemployment, Social Security and Medicare taxes. As a result, gig workers can find themselves paid sub-minimum wages, for example, or left without workers' compensation when injured or killed on the job. Another consequence is that law-abiding employers face unfair competition with businesses that don't follow the rules, and critical safety-net programs like unemployment insurance lose badly needed funds.

The Denver cases make it clear that the gig business model isn't just about drivers and food delivery workers anymore. Instawork, for example, also places warehouse, housekeeping, janitorial and retail workers, and Gigpro places workers at hotels. San Francisco's city attorney, David Chiu, sued Qwick, a hospitality staffing company, last year, succinctly summing up the gig business model: "Qwick is inequality disguised as innovation, a staffing company with an app that is in flagrant violation of labor and employment laws."

With rare exceptions, businesses that use similar independent contractor models in other sectors, like health care and education, generally have not yet faced government scrutiny. If corporations can avoid workplace laws just by hiring workers via an app and giving them a modicum of scheduling flexibility, workers are in big trouble.

Denver Labor's citations lay out in detail the extensive control that Instawork and Gigpro exerted over their workers. At Instawork, for example, workers (in company lingo, "professionals") can't use their cellphones while on the job, their performance is continuously monitored, and they must have their location tracking services activated. As the citations note, there are also public health implications, when "workers who prepare and serve food and beverages" in "close-quarters interactions" are denied paid sick leave.

The Biden administration's Labor Department earlier this month issued a robust federal rule, effective in March, that is likely to make it harder for employers to treat workers as independent contractors rather than employees. It's already been challenged in court by a group of freelance writers and editors.

Given the Supreme Court's hostility to worker rights and government regulation, state and local governments must play a leading role in protecting workers. Some, like Denver Labor, have already stepped up to the task. The attorneys general for Minnesota and the District of Columbia sued the gig delivery company Shipt in 2022, and New York City and Seattle recently enacted minimum wages for certain gig workers.

But the spread of the exploitative model laid bare by Denver Labor shows the need for far more action.

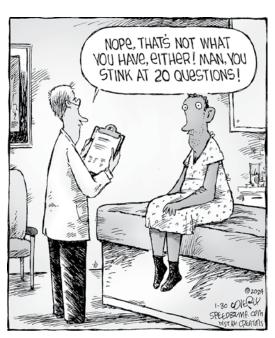

New laws preventing abuses by tightening the definition of "independent contractor" would help. But legislation alone isn't the answer; enforcement is also essential. Even under current law in many states, workers engaged by these online platforms — restaurant dishwashers, prep cooks, hospital nurses and janitors — would already be considered employees entitled to the protection of workplace laws.

American businesses large and small have managed to operate and flourish while paying minimum wage and overtime, providing a safe workplace, buying workers' compensation insurance, and paying unemployment insurance and other payroll taxes. They've made a choice not to engage in the fiction that their employees are running small businesses. Allowing the gig model to expand and fester would be a choice as well — a choice with terrible outcomes for workers.
