LABOR LAW CORNER

Yesterday our store was very busy, so I could not let my employee leave for a meal break until very late in the day. Do I owe the employee a one-hour meal period penalty because their lunch break was late, or is it owed only if they didn't get a meal break at all?

California's meal period penalty is owed both when an employer fails to provide an employee with a meal break at all, as well as when the meal break is provided later than is legally required. The penalty is known as premium pay.

Meal Break Mandate

California law mandates that meal breaks must be provided on shifts over a certain length, and also sets a time by which meal breaks must be taken. Employees who work more than five hours must be provided with a meal break of at least 30 minutes, and that meal break must begin no later than the end of the employee's fifth hour of work. This means the employee must clock out for a meal break no later than 4 hours and 59 minutes after starting work. Note that there is an exception allowing an employee who works no more than six hours to waive their meal period with consent of the employer. These rules regarding meal period requirements are contained in Labor Code Sections 226.7 and 512, as well as Section 11 of each of California's Industrial Welfare Commission (IWC) Wage Orders.

Premium Pay Penalty

Labor Code Section 226.7(c) requires a penalty of one additional hour of pay at the employee's regular rate of compensation "if an employer fails to provide an employee a meal ... period in accordance with a state law, including, but not limited to, an applicable statute or applicable regulation, standard, or order of the Industrial Welfare Commission...." Since providing a meal break that starts later than the end of the employee's fifth hour of work is not in accordance with the timing requirement in the state Labor Code and the IWC Wage Orders, one hour of premium pay is owed to an employee who is not provided a meal break until after that time. This is true even though the employee eventually was provided with a meal break later in the day.

Second Meal Break

A second meal break is required when an employee works longer than 10 hours. The meal break must begin no later than the end of the 10th hour of work. An employee may waive the second meal break if they will work no longer than 12 hours and have taken the first meal break as required. A meal break penalty is owed to an employee whose required second meal break is not provided, or provided later than the required time. If the employee were to be denied both meal breaks or given both meal breaks late, however, the statute requires payment of the penalty only once for each workday. This means an employee who was provided late meal breaks multiple times in one day, or given no meal breaks at all, would receive only one hour of premium pay.

Note that there is an exception to the meal break rules for employees working in the motion picture industry under IWC Wage Order 12, which allows those employees to work up to six hours without a meal period, even without a waiver.

DROUGHT PREPARATIONS PICKING UP AS STATE DRY SPELL CONTINUES WITH NO RELIEF IN SIGHT

California's water supply levels are continuing to drop closer to those at the beginning of 2014, which was the start of the last drought cycle. The whole state is in some sort of drought, with conditions ranging from abnormally dry to exceptional drought, according to the U.S. Drought Monitor map. As reservoir levels continue to drop, hydropower production also may decline. Dry conditions and the resulting water supply cutbacks pose challenges for food producers. The state is particularly dry because 2020 was a very hot climatic year combined with a very dry water year. Although the state carried over about 300,000 acre-feet at Lake Oroville, the reservoir is holding 53% of its historic average while Lake Shasta is at 61% of historic average.

Governor's Order

On April 21, Governor Gavin Newsom directed state agencies to act immediately "to bolster drought resilience and prepare for impacts on communities, businesses and ecosystems if dry conditions extend to a third year." At a news conference the same day, he signed a drought emergency declaration for Mendocino and Sonoma counties in the Russian River watershed. The Governor emphasized the importance of a regional approach to tackling the drought and said the administration is prepared to add drought declarations for other communities if local conditions warrant it. The administration's drought task force, chaired by Resources Agency Secretary Wade Crowfoot, has been actively monitoring water conditions statewide since last fall.

Allocation Cutbacks

In March, state and federal water officials cut projected amounts of water they plan to send farmers and cities. The state Department of Water Resources (DWR) cut initial allocations of 10% to 5% of requested supplies. The U.S. Bureau of Reclamation told its water contractors that the Bureau was freezing allocations and not to expect to receive any water until a reassessment in June. The State Water Resources Control Board (State Water Board) sent notices to California's 40,000 water users, from small farms to big cities, informing them of likely cuts to water supplies. It was a preliminary warning to water rights holders that there isn't enough supply to fulfill all the water rights on the books. The State Water Board will probably know by May or June if orders to stop taking surface water will be necessary. The Reclamation Bureau announced this month that springtime operations at Shasta Dam will adjust to benefit endangered winter-run Chinook salmon in the Sacramento River during this critically dry water year. Change is coordinated between state and federal agencies plus the Sacramento River Settlement Contractors to preserve the limited supply of cold water behind the dam. What the Bureau's announcement means is that warmer water will be released from the dam, holding back cold water for later in the year when the salmon need it. The releases will bypass Shasta's power plant, reducing the hydropower generated. Shasta's power plant provides power to an estimated 250,000 households per day.

Colorado River Basin

Lake Mead and Lake Powell (close to the Arizona-Utah border) haven't rebounded from hot, dry conditions of the last 21 years. The reservoirs will likely drop later this year, leading to mandatory conservation by some of the biggest users of the river's water. It looks like Lake Mead on the Arizona-Nevada state line will drop below 1,075 feet in elevation in June. That's going to trigger a shortage declaration. Federal officials, however, regularly issue long-term projections in August with cuts taking place in January. Arizona, Nevada and Mexico voluntarily gave up Colorado River water under a drought contingency plan in 2019. The two U.S. states would be the first to be subject to mandatory cuts. California eventually will have to reduce its Colorado River draw if the drought continues.

Reducing Water Use

Many water districts and agencies have been working with their customers for the last couple of months to reduce water usage. Not every district has groundwater supplies to fall back on, so early conservation is necessary. There were 40 applications for water transfers in the first quarter of this year — up from 19 applications in 2020. But transferring water works only if there are supplies to transfer. Earlier this week, the Marin Municipal Water District became the first in the state to impose mandatory conservation measures, with penalties being enforced starting May 1.

Food Production

Agricultural operations have been trying to decide how much to plant or whether to decrease herds depending on water availability. Since the end of February, farmers have been planting in the Central Valley and planting continues in some commodities. Ranchers in the Klamath area are culling herds to reduce the need to purchase supplemental feed and water for cattle. Orchardists will have to keep irrigating so their trees don't die, whereas other types of growers can fallow land to save water.

Lessons from History

California learned much from the last drought cycle. Conservation measures are embedded into how water is used. Businesses upgraded equipment and employed water-saving strategies in operations. Agriculture continued investments in technology to grow more produce using less water. Residential users purchased newer water-saving appliances, changed landscaping, and found ways to reduce their water usage. The state is in better shape to deal with drought than it was in 2014. Still, a drought now brings a whole set of new problems for business and agriculture to contend with on the heels of staying viable through a pandemic that caused many disruptions and financial hardships.

COVID CORNER

Vaccination Is Key to Reopen Economy

Reopening Set for June 15

Earlier this month, Governor Newsom announced that California would be reopening its economy on June 15. Why, Zarembek asks Myers, did the Governor choose June 15? Two science-based factors determined that decision, Myers replies. One factor is that COVID-19 vaccines are now widely available and when the podcast was recorded almost 23 million doses had already been distributed. Moreover, Californians can expect to see the vaccine supply increase in the coming weeks. [As of April 21, more than 26 million vaccines had been administered.] The second factor is that there has been a substantial decrease in COVID-19 infection rates, and hospitalization and intensive care unit (ICU) rates, she says. The eligibility for the COVID-19 vaccine opened to everyone over 16 years old on April 15, so the June 15 date was chosen to give people enough time to make their vaccination appointments and receive their two doses of the vaccine and reach peak immunity. By June 15, Myers says, there should be a substantial number of people who have been vaccinated. But just because the economy is reopening does not mean that the virus is no longer a threat. Myers cautions that the state will have moved on enough to reopen, but people will still need to take common sense safety precautions.

Vaccine Is a 'Game Changer'

Even though the COVID-19 vaccine is available, there is still some vaccine hesitancy, so it's on us to educate people, Myers says. President Joe Biden said that everyone who wants a vaccine will be able to get one by the end of May, so organizations and businesses should encourage people to get vaccinated. State officials will be working to make vaccines accessible to vulnerable communities and provide vaccines in close proximity to where people live. Businesses can encourage their workers to get vaccinated by providing incentives, such as granting time off, she says. The most important thing people can do to help fight this virus is to get vaccinated, she urges. Zarembek agrees, saying, "There's no question that vaccines are a game changer." He points out that the difference vaccines can have can be seen between California and wealthy countries that don't have vaccines available. Countries like Germany and France remain locked down, while California is reopening. In encouraging others to get vaccinated, Myers suggests that people highlight the fact that vaccinated people won't have to wear a mask when they are in an indoor area with other vaccinated people. Vaccinated people also will be able to attend indoor concerts and sporting events. "Let's continue to be mindful so that we can go back to business and go back to the lives and activities that we love and that we've all missed so much," she says.

'Light at the End of Tunnel'

The COVID-19 pandemic has affected the business community unevenly, with some businesses prospering, while others, such as those in the tourism and hospitality sector, were hit hard, Zarembek says. Tourism and hospitality are a critical piece of California's economy, Myers says, and another reason the Governor chose June 15 as the reopening date is to give businesses more predictability and time to prepare for conferences and events. Visit California will soon be promoting areas of the state that people can visit, she adds, and travel rules for out-of-state visitors, such as vaccine requirements, will also be developed. Will the state develop a way for people to prove they've taken the vaccine, Zarembek asks? California will not be developing its own vaccine platform, or "vaccine passport," Myers answers. Instead, the state is leaving it up to the private sector to develop platforms and it will be up to individuals to choose how they want to demonstrate that they've taken the vaccine, such as through provider documents or a vaccination card. In wrapping up the podcast, Zarembek urges listeners to get vaccinated and encourage the people around them to get vaccinated as well. The most important thing we can do as residents of California and as members of our communities is to get vaccinated, Myers says. The vaccine is working even better than was expected and it is the light at the end of the tunnel to get customers and the community back to normal. State grant and loan programs through GO-Biz are available to help businesses reopen and bring employees back to work. For more information, visit <https://business.ca.gov/coronavirus-2019/>.

FOOD DISTRIBUTION EVENT IN NORWALK

On April 2nd, the Norwalk Lions Club coordinated a Food Distribution Event here in Norwalk. This event was held in partnership with the Norwalk Chamber of Commerce, the City of Norwalk, Norwalk Metropolitan Hospital, Horizon Pacific, Los Angeles County Supervisor Janice Hahn, and the Los Angeles County Regional Food Bank. Volunteers and staff for the distribution showed up bright and early at 6am on Friday morning to get everything set up. Norwalk Lions Club members attended to help with traffic directing while the Metropolitan State Hospital Police kept the vehicles moving through the lines. Our City of Norwalk Public Safety Department was also providing traffic control and support. Horizon Pacific provided the venue for the event, which was located behind Esporta Gym on Imperial Hwy. We want to especially thank Dora Sandoval of the Norwalk Lions Club for making all of the connections with the various groups so that this event could be put on to help our Norwalk residents.
